Graduation: An Accomplishment

Graduation.

The word has a pleasant sound of completion and accomplishment. When someone tells me he has graduated, I immediately extend my warmest congratulations. It doesn't matter if he has graduated from four weeks of training in creative writing or from law school. I hold in high regard the graduate as a person who reached the stage of completion in his chosen discipline.

Graduation was not an assumed step in my life. I did not arrive at UNR four years ago expecting to walk away with a certificate of my growth.

What motivated me to apply to UNR while still in high school was probably common among many of us. I wanted to see what the big fuss over college was all about. Several of my friends were planning to attend UNR and my parents responded favorably to the idea, so I was all set.

I was ready to test the waters of higher education. I had no idea my curiosity would lead to a four-year commitment and end with graduation.

It was only with my own graduation that I realized the burden a degree can bring. I now understand the expectations that degree dictates. As the end of my final semester approached, family, friends and distant acquaintances began asking me my postgraduation plans. Initially, I was startled. For so long going to college had been all that was in my future and there was no pressure to do anything else. At the start of what would become a barrage of questions, I attempted to answer them with sincerity. I responded that I was undecided but that I was considering the Peace Corps or working for a non-profit organization. This went against the go-to-college-to better-your-income philosophy.

My postgraduation plans were met with disappointment and disapproval. This led to my quick realization that what they wanted to hear was not the truth, but something close to their expectations of what a college graduate should do. Therefore, I changed my list of responses to be less serious and more easily communicated. Depending on my mood at the time the question was asked, I would respond that upon graduation I planned to:

- Clean my room
- Attend matinees every day
- Read trashy bestsellers
- Find a rich man
- Balance my checkbook
- And, on a more contemplative note:
- Take time to form my own opinion.

There was a time during my college life that I sought things which would allow me to avoid concentrating on my course work. Like many other students, I looked into joining a social sorority and a professional student fraternity. Both of these groups provided me with a way to avoid academics, but neither seemed to be what I had in mind. I turned instead to student government.

When I look back at the lessons I learned at UNR, I realize that many of them were learned through involvement in campus groups. I never ran for office in ASUN, instead I held appointed positions on several university boards and committees. I also served on a inter-college board and was involved with Student Orientation Staff and the alcohol education program. My involvement taught me that I could not do all that I felt should and could be done. This sounds apparent enough, but it is only learned through many confrontations and much frustration.

College was not easy for me. I did not attend class and respond to test questions without thinking about what they were trying to teach me. Nor did I accept the philosophy put forth by the college as being the right and only way to think. I learned to question. The popular phrase "Question Authority" is over simplified. College taught me to question everything before accepting it. And, with pain, I learned to accept things that I had questioned and found unfair. Before I went to college, I never questioned the ability of the President of the United States, the best nation in the world. Now I have a Bonzo and Ronnie poster on my bathroom wall.

During my time at UNR, I learned that belief in the unknown is essential to maintain optimism toward the future of man. My education has shown me that the world faces many interrelated problems but that it has the potential to solve its problems.

I also learned the value of being in contact with people who have opposing points of view. I came to understand that I could respect someone's opinion without agreeing with it.

May Days 81; E

When I look back at my education, I think of the professors and courses I had that I enjoyed. But upon further reflection I realize that my education exposed me to much more than lectures and textbooks.

The entire UNR environment contributed to my growth. It is not easy to pinpoint the contribution made to my education by attending a Holly Near concert, or the philosophical balance provided by cross country skiing courses. I would argue that they do exist on a list of what was important to my personal development. Many experiences cannot be measured in dollars but are a part of any college memorabilia.

This is how I view the semester I lived in White Pine Hall. I had never lived with a stranger before and this is an experience which can cause just a bit of stressful anticipation. But for most dormies the experience is rewarding. It is not easy to get along with someone who has been raised in a different family situation. My roommate had ten brothers and sisters. She was an expert in sharing and successfully taught me this attribute. I just hope that I was able to teach her something of equal value.

Besides the convenience of events on the UNR campus, one cannot overlook the benefit of student discounts. Where else can you afford to go to a ballet, hear a Devo concert, watch G. Gordon Liddy and Timothy Leary debate, listen to John Ciardi explain etymology, cheer on the Wolf Pack teams, view an art exhibit by art alumni, experience a beer bash/dance at the armory, munch out at all-school picnics and cantaloupe a la modes, attend movies at half the price, ski for discount rates during Winter Carnival and watch the Board of Regents decide students' future, all on a student's budget?

It is specific aspects of the university that draw and keep individuals, but it is the entire spectrum known as the University of Nevada-Reno that educates us.

Family and friends who did not attend college ask me if I feel it was worth it. I answer without hesitation that I do consider it a good use of my time. My unwaivering response results from remembering only the good times and not the stress and tension created by the college routine.

I chose to forget the frightening feeling I had when my friends talked of dreams about being with Warren Beatty in a chalet in the Swiss Alps drinking mulled wine before a blazing fire and my nights' sleep were spent watching my statistics teacher go through multiple regression analysis one more time. How I envied my friends for their freedom to dream and fantasize while my dreams were polluted with equations.

It was during more than one cram session that I considered asking a man to marry me and move to a farm where our sole purpose would be to raise children and bake bread. Perhaps what kept me from this is my never-ending desire for independence.

All School Picnic: B. Webb

Mackay Days 81: B. Webb

The road to graduation was long and strewn with booby traps but the feeling of arrival is worth every step taken. I recently explained to a friend that being out of school is like being naked. When you are naked and the wind and water come in contact with your body, the sensation is unfiltered. Your reactions are more immediate and often times more appropriate. This is now I felt when the pressures of school became relaxed through graduation. My body and mind were free to experience life in a direct and uncensored way. I no longer sit in a theater wondering if the movie would be a good source for my next essay. Instead, I am free to enjoy the movie from a personal standpoint.

Now that my education at UNR is completed, I look at the road ahead with restless anticipation. I know that whatever I do and whoever I meet I will have a more open-mind and a clearer idea of my strengths and weaknesses.

I have just one warning for all who plan to someday be termed "a college graduate". You will have to put up with comments like the following:

You should know what you want out of life - you're a college graduate.

You should have a speciality - you're a college graduate.

You should be able to spell correctly - you're a college graduate.

You should know the Second Law of Thermodynamics - you're a college graduate.

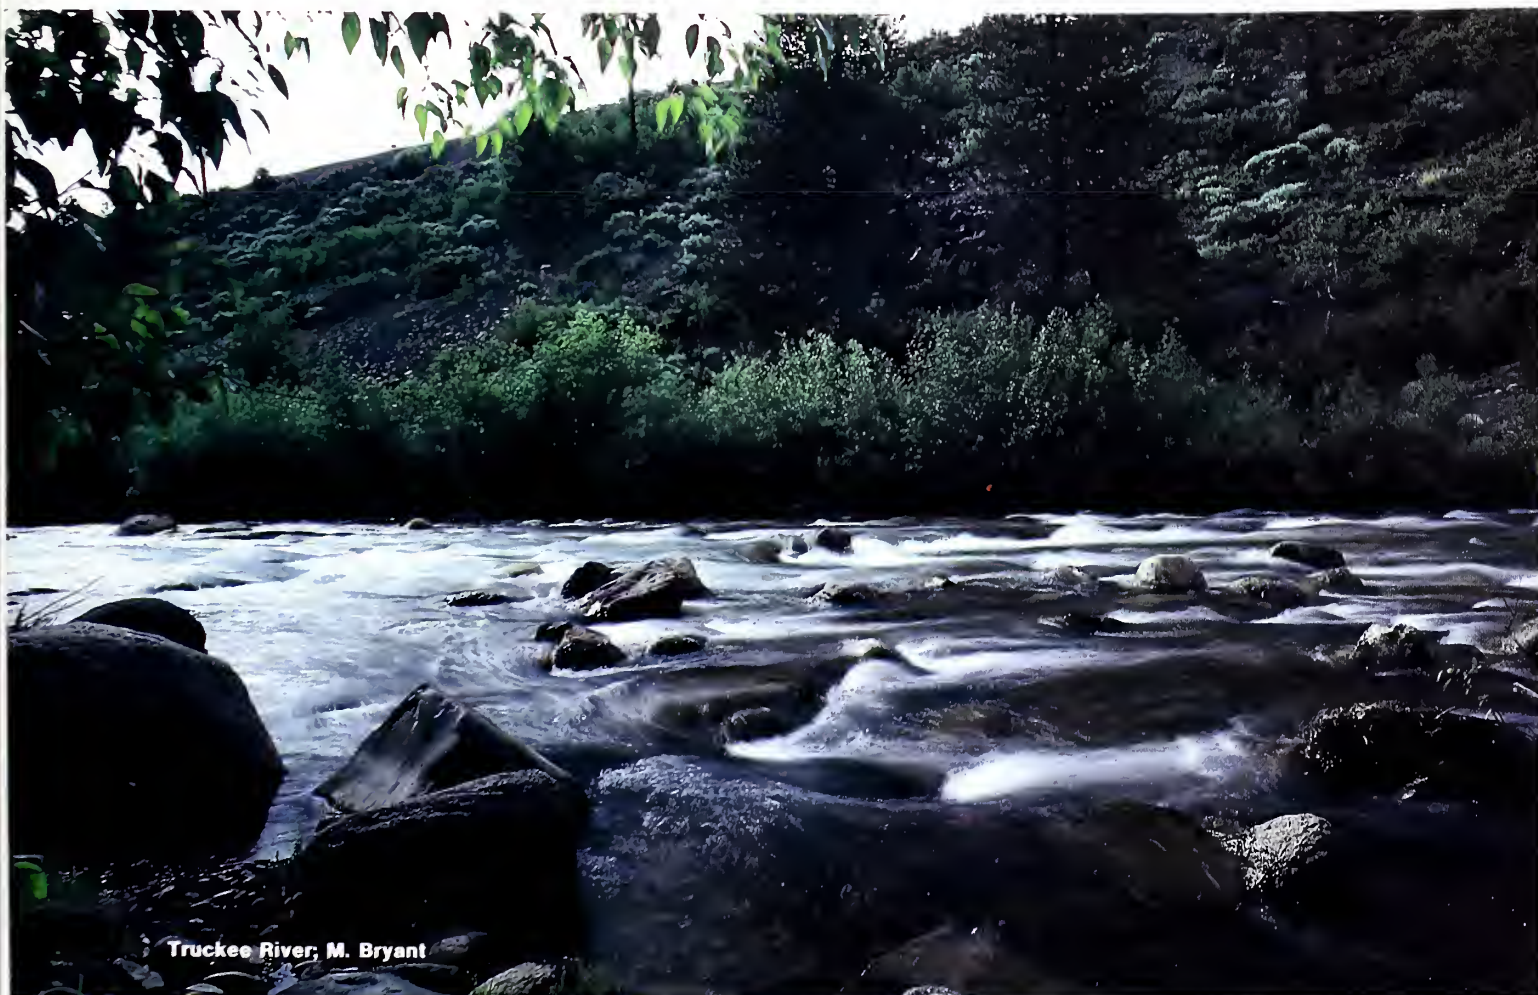

You should be able to write a complete sentence - you're a college graduate.

Some people view education as preparation for a job. I prefer to think of it as preparation for life. By adopting this philosophy I avoid feeling guilty because I attended college for four years and still cannot spell correctly. I loved school and for me nothing in life is as enriching as the art of learning, not even the art of earning.

Somewhere during my courses, I realized that not everything that is relative to life is applicable to the work setting, nor should it be. This made it easier for me to devote time to humanity courses and not computer courses.

Graduation.

The term means for me an accomplishment in itself. Not the path toward an accomplishment. Unfortunately, I don't think that my parents or Nevada taxpayers had that in mind when they funded my four-years of self-indulgence.

"My mom put my two sisters and I into a summer league during vacation to keep us out of trouble. I started competing when I was five.

The high point of college competition was during my first year when I placed third in the 200-yard butterfly. This year while swimming in Las Vegas I tied that time.

I like all sports. Running . Racquetball. I like any kind of recreation. I love to cross-country skiing. I do crafts like ceramics and batiking.

I'm a physical education major. I'm going to minor in nutrition, and then work in a health clinic. That would be ideal.

Once college is over, that is it for swimming. There is no such thing as professional swimming.

My attitude toward swimming has changed throughout the years. I used to do it for the competition. Now, I do it for the social part and the exercise. The competition thing is over. I like to swim.

Any athletics on the college level is just as hard, or harder, than a job. The physical activity is draining. To mentally prepare yourself is a 24-hour thing. Swimming is paying for my education. So actually it is like I'm working. You're earning your money. But it is much more enjoyable.

My advice to a freshman would be to relax, and to not get caught up in the tense competition.

I'm here from 6:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. everyday. You learn to be very organized as you try to balance school and swimming. Swimming, school, swimming, school, school, swimming. Then I do my homework."

"Football takes a lot of time. During the season it's seven days a week, 25 hours total.

As a punter, I've made the all-league team twice. I've placed fourth in the nation for Division IAA. I'm also an Academic All-American.

I played my freshman year, but was injured in my sophomore so I didn't play.

My football scholarship is a way to get an education. My primary goal is my education in electrical engineering. My GPA is 3.92.

Football is a once in a lifetime opportunity, but I can't count on going professional.

When I'm not playing football, I study. You have to study in engineering. I participate in intramural basketball, and I backpack and fish.

I'm also a Christian. Several players and I get together for Bible study on Thursday nights.

I believe that the dumb athlete image is getting dispelled. Players have to try as hard in the classroom as on the field. Coaches stress education. There is a time study table that players go to.

"I love all sports. They help me keep a clear head. I'd go crazy if I just studied all the time. I have a 3.05 overall GPA, but I don't study too much.

The most credits I'll ever take is 13 or so. I never overload myself. I wouldn't stay sane with 19 credits. I'm in no hurry to get out. Grades are important, but not all important.

I'd like to do something in design. I'm not totally sold on mechanical engineering. I won't work at a desk working with data sheets, no way. I might look into aviation; you know, like father like son. I want to play around after I graduate, maybe ski for a while.

I'm pretty much into water skiing, soccer and running long distance running - besides snow skiing. I've run in a couple marathons.

I'm motivated in my skiing by improvement, but mostly by enjoyment, especially as a team sport. The team aspect has really added another dimension to skiing. It's fine to race as an individual, but the team is what's really important.

Racing in skiing is almost over for me, but I will always ski. It has been so beneficial to my life in general. I've learned to be modest. You don't have to be cocky, and the people in the competition make you learn that. That goes for all sports. I've learned a lot about team commeraderie.

As far as going pro, well, i've thought about it. I might consider it, but I wouldn't be dependent on it or want to do it as a living.

I think the professionals do it because they like it. The top guys are hungry for the competition, not the money, just the racing.

Every sport has its respective image. I see stereotypes in athletics and it bothers me, but skiers don't really have one. The skiers aren't all that well known. There's not enough money in skiing to get away with anything, like in football. We don't get any special breaks.

"I played four years of football and baseball, also three years of basketball in high school. I liked football because it was more exciting, but I didn't really have the size to continue, and I really liked baseball the best. Besides, my dad played pro baseball and he kind of pushed me in that direction. I've been playing since I was eight.

Everyone wants to go to a big school and play sports, but I chose UNR from encouragement by friends and recruitment by the coach. Not everyone can play for Arizona State.

I'm very much a family oriented person. During the season I don't get home much, and my family goes to almost all my games. When I do get home, my favorite things to do are fish and play with my three nieces. I like that a lot. I really love spending time with them, they come to all my games. I also like to hunt when I can.

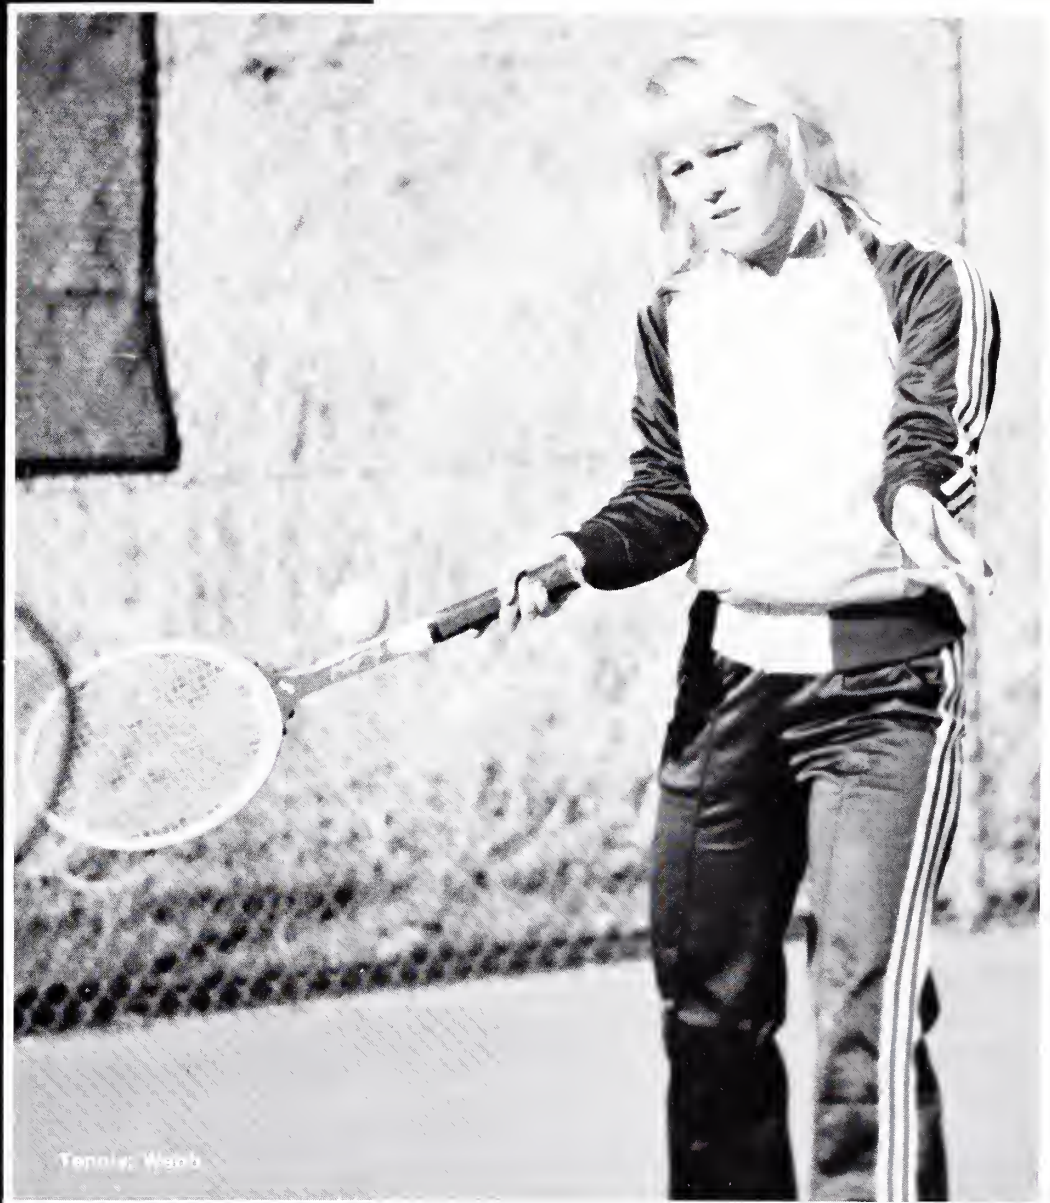

Getting my education is number one. It's a base for everything else. My parents place my education first, then comes baseball. I wanted to get into physical therapy at one time, but physical education is a good foundation.

My goal is to get my degree, teach and coach. I would like to play professional baseball, but the world won't end if I can't. It's a hard situation looking at my competitive days. I don't want to quit because I like the game so much. All I really want is a shot to try-out with the pros. If I don't make it, I want to coach.

The image of "big time" college sports isn't at UNR. Everyone is equal. I don't know about the other sports, but we don't get any special favors. We have to work just as hard as everyone else for our grades. In baseball, the only difference about being an athlete is that when you're on the field you're an athlete and when you're in the classroom you're a student. I learned a lesson from watching other players wash out and lose their eligibility by not studying."

"I started playing tennis when I was 14- years-old. A coach saw me jumping rope when I was in eighth grade and decided to develop me as a player. I loved it immediately. I played that summer, everyday, all day long. I played on the boy's tennis team in high school before the law that banned girls from playing on boy's teams went into effect.

The turning point in my tennis career was at nationals in 1976. I was ahead in a crucial match and I lost. I used to play for someone else before that match. From then on, it was my success or my defeat. I've played much better tennis since then. My parents always wanted me to pursue piano playing. I accompanied my brother for six years, and they wanted me to try and play tennis and the piano at the same time. I wanted to try something unique.

I was raised with the philosophy that education comes first. Tennis has been a tool for a free education for me. I plan on playing tennis the rest of my life, but I don't want to continue on with it as a career, by going pro. There's too much time and money in it.

After high school I went through a period of doubt. It was at that point, when I wanted to quit, that I decided to do something for me. It would have been easy for me to stay home and go to Berkeley like the rest of the family, but I decided to branch out and go away.

Tennis is a total outlet for me. I play when I feel good, or when I feel bad. There's not a time when I don't want to play. When people reach their goals, they can do one of two things. They can reach the goal and quit, or they can reach it and continue on for fun. I'll continue on just because I love to play.

I'd like to get into police work someday. Some kind of administrative or street work, eventually the FBI. I guess I'm so disgusted with what I see, I want to try and do something about it.

Stereotypes help people organize their feelings. The way I see it, the image you project is the way you'll be treated. So that stereotyped image of a jock is because many athletes project themselves that way. If you don't study or go to class and wear cut off jerseys, you're going to have that image. But take Frank Hawkins. He was an overachiever. When people are outstanding in something else, they don't get labeled.

As an athlete, I don't get away with anything. I'm never given an advantage because I don't want any. I probably could get some because I'm playing for the school, but I don't want any preferential treatment.

‘ ‘ I think the future of the university is inevitably tied to the future of the state of Nevada.

The basic goal is excellence. Excellence in program; excellence in students that we attract here. That is, we want to get the very best students in the state.

The likelihood in terms of size is that we will continue to grow at a moderate pace as we have over the past 10 or 12 years. I would not anticipate that we would get a lot larger over the next 10 years.

We can continue to be a small state university which has all kinds of benefits, particularly for students. We can avoid the large classes, generality and bureaucratic atmosphere that one inevitably finds with very large institutions. That's a real plus for us.

There will be some changes in the student body, perhaps some that we can't project at this point. I think we will be technologically more advanced institution in terms of using a wide variety of computer capability that currently exists and is probably going to get larger in terms of using telecommunications for academic program purposes.

We're going to be in some ways a different institution but after all we're 108 years old and we're not going to depart radically from the sound values and traditions to which we are anchored.

I'd tell a student that there's world enough of time to decide on his or her future insofar as this university is involved in preparing for the future; that there is a virtue in experimenting in different curriculum before deciding on how one wants to spend the next 40 or 50 years.

And that it is important to have goals and that they be achievable goals. And it's important to be disciplined in order to allow you to achieve goals and that there isn't any substitute ultimately for good study habits; and that the most important attribute one can bring to a university is a love for learning. It'll be with you all your life and the rewards are substantial.

The time that a student spends here should be a very important chapter in the student's life. This is part of the real world and a special part of the real world and at the same time we must recognize that there is another world out there and that we have an obligation to prepare our students for success in that world.

So it's not the world of the campus versus the real world. It's this part of the real world versus other parts of the real world. ’ ’

Richard O. Davies

Vice President Of Academic Affairs

‘ ‘ I think the future of the university is very bright. The university is situated in a part of the country that will continue to grow. Enrollment projections for the university are reasonably strong. I think the university is maturing rapidly in terms of its teaching programs as well as its research efforts, and I would say that the real bright years lie in the next 20 years.

One of the guidelines that I always try to keep in mind is that I want a degree from UNR to become more valuable, in other words, that the quality of the institution in 1985 will be such that the students' graduating here will be associated with a university on the basis of quality and will continue to improve rather than regress.

Specifically, I see a changing mood in Reno and Nevada toward the university system — a growing awareness that the university is a very valuable institution in this state.

UNR's biggest problem is that we have not yet been able to acquire, what I call a margin of excellence in our funding. We're reasonably close in taking the important step to the next level of quality and I think it's something we're addressing. We simply do not have sufficient faculty to offer the programs we would like to offer. I would like to be able to greatly increase the funding for faculty research because this has a direct impact upon the quality of instructional program.

If I were to give advice to a student it would be to use the opportunities available to you; to learn and to grow; to explore new areas; to find out about the world in which you are going to be living; to use your college years to prepare for not only earning a living but for living a life. And don't hesitate to take on new areas. Attend lecture programs, attend film series, attend concerts, plays and athletic events.

Your education is not just what happens in the classroom or the laboratory. It is the whole cultural ambiance of the campus. ’ ’

“I think the future of UNR is kind of rosey. The future of the nation is right here on these campuses, and without this enterprise we have no future.

It really is a good university and it has a strong faculty and a good student body.

We have certain budgetary constraints that make it difficult for us to expand in the academic offerings. We're pretty busy just trying to maintain quality in the existing programs. But that's not unique; it's happening across the country. I think that may present us with an opportunity to maybe restructure the curriculum within the existing framework rather than building on top of what we already have.

Individually or collectively, we don't really look for change. We're comfortable with whatever it is we're doing. Change is disrupting and disconcerting. When you're forced to do it, sometimes you're better off. And I hope and think that is what will happen here.

It's a big, complex organization. There's 2,000 employees and there's a lot of traditions. We're talking about kind of a social change.

If I were to give advice to a student, I would tell him to get all the education he can and as diversified an education as he can get. You feel like you should enter college with a certain goal, and you pursue that goal and you go on and that's what you do the rest of your life — but it doesn't happen that way. Stretch yourself a little bit because you may not have any idea of what your potentials are; you probably don't. Most of us don't.”

‘ ‘ This university grew, but I feel that the funding didn't keep pace with the growth. Now that it's being curtailed, it's hurting us a little more than other campuses that grew faster than we did. We never caught up to where we should have been.

I think Nevada attracts a very fine caliber of students. We have a wide range represented as far as abilities and background, and it's a very nice campus to work on because of the students.

I would advise students to take advantage of all the resources the university has to offer. A lot of students graduate from their university without knowing that we have a counseling office, that we have a tutorial program, that we have a health service, all of the services that are available to help students survive in this atmosphere. I would also advise them to take advantage of the extracurricular programs on campus. We know that students who get involved in a club or organization have a much better chance to survive because getting involved in a group helps people feel that they belong to a university, and that encourages them to continue.

Your education doesn't prepare you for the first job your going to have, but the last. The fact that jobs aren't readily available to college graduates, I don't believe, has limited the value of higher education at all because the experience gives one a much richer life. It's crucial that the best minds get the best training. ’ ’

‘ ‘ Whenever there’s a problem the students may have with the system here at the university, this is the place they’re typically referred to. This office is basically for students who need to get in contact with a student for some emergency reason.

I’m impressed with students here. I guess the thing that impressed me is the social nature of the institution. I think probably the high social aspect of the students’ lives here was something you had to get used to.

I encourage the students to be open to the several possibilities in their life. There are things that happen when they are in college that will effect them for the rest of their lives. There are decisions they make when they’re in college that will route them on some particular track, and it becomes increasingly more difficult to change once you get out of this dynamic position we’re in as students at a university.

Ever since I’ve been here one of the primary problems I see among students and some organizations is their dependence upon alcoholic beverages for their comederie. I hate to see the reliance of several organizations to have beer because no one would show up if they didn’t. That’s been a continual problem, not just at UNR, but across the country.

We’re getting an older mix of students now, and one of the things I’d like to be able to see is the student government begin to recognize the fact that their constituency is changing.

Higher education, for me, is a real opportunity for personal development. Learning is a given, and so much of the value of a university comes not from the classroom or from the textbook, but from being in this experience. ’ ’

Pete Perriera

Assistant Dean Of Students

“ I would love to tell students to be more patient. I am shocked at how impatient the young people are. Nothing comes fast. There's got to be some way to teach the young people to be a little bit more patient, that it can't happen right away.

It's harder to learn now, because there's more to learn. A lot of students may be forced to stay out of school because of Reagonomics. The first thing is money, because if you can't afford to go, then what happens?

We're losing all of our supportive programs. There are some people who are highly motivated, genuinely concerned with bettering themselves, and they want to learn. Everytime a student walks into a university and doesn't get to stay for the long duration that is requires to get a degree, that student benefits somewhat personally.

In the personal sense, education is more important today than ever. There's so much more to learn. You're a better person when you're educated. ”

Pete Perriera; Newman

Dave Hansen / man

David Hansen

Assistant Dean Of Students

‘ ‘ In general terms, as far as student services, I’ve seen programs developing; more emphasis toward non-traditional students rather than just the traditional freshmen living on campus.

Since I deal with new students a lot, I have some good healthy advice for any student. I think that they need to become familiar with the services and the people that are here at the university. If they don’t take the initiative, often times there may be some programs, services or tutors that could be very helpful to them, and they’re not aware of it.

I think people can get caught up in their own routine, as we all do. That can become very narrow, very limiting for them, and I think that’s a real drawback that any student attending here, whether they’re a new one or a senior. They need to look to see what’s here because there are new programs and services trying to be expanded each semester.

I think money has been very frustrating for us because we want to provide more services for students. That probably is the major problem I’ve seen.

The attitude here of the students is generally very good. I like the campus. I like the people. I like the student population we have because it’s challenging because there’s so much going on. They’re very appreciative of what’s done, and I think that’s a nice return for the job that we do. ’ ’

Dale Bohmont Agriculture

“ In a land-grant institution, agriculture is unique. It has all the other tendrils out there. The teaching function fits in nicely - we have graduate students who learn to do the things that will make them leaders in the programs. The undergraduates, of course, contend with a bachelor's degree.

There are about 19 options in this college - it's not just agriculture and farming. There are renewable resources, wildlife management, park and recreation management, and biochemistry.

Those all fit with the professors who have no more than one-fourth of their time in teaching and three-fourths in something else.

You say, are the students different and are you proud of them? You bet I am. I think they're brighter than we've seen before.

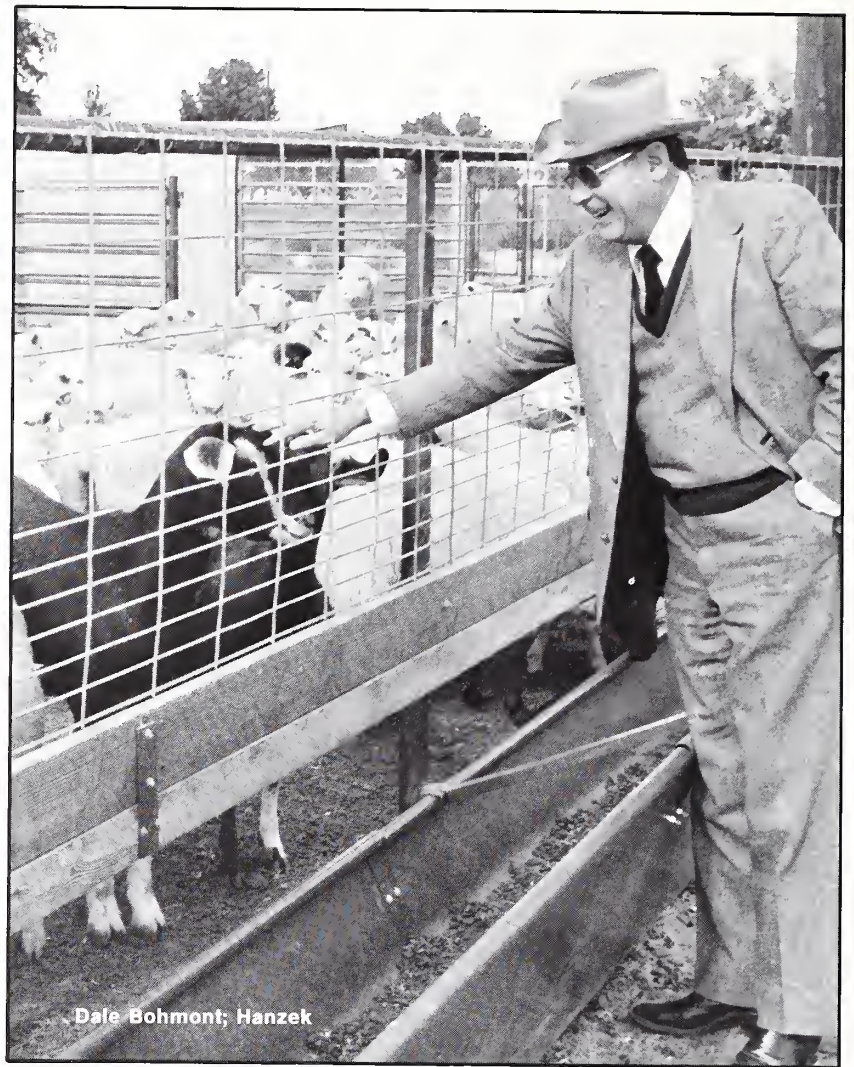

There are more occupations in agriculture than any single industry in the nation. We're giving a chance to get some of the exposure to the type of things you appreciate: the fact that there is a water requirement of plants, and then how you get the water. All are very practical applications of the sciences.

We have a ranch that was given to us. We're putting this into a system where I think it'll be an excellent educational process. The book doesn't teach you what this college is about.

I think the two things that I would encourage a student to do is, when they come to college, they shouldn't be so shocked when they don't know what they want to be. You need an adviser. I encourage them to take advisers who really have been around.

Second, just because the job that you were training for is not right there, don't feel that you are not a success. Whatever comes down the line that makes good sense that you want to take, take it and be proud, but don't forget to counsel us on what you could have done better and what we could have done better for you.

I think that in the next 10 years, you're going to find agriculture is going to be the single most important college on this campus. Food is very important. People are going to find out where it's coming from. ”

Dale Bohmont; Hanzek

Paul Page Arts And Science

‘ ‘ We have more students now. I think the liberal arts education will be more in the vogue during the 1980s.

My view is that it's a strong college, and could be stronger. It's a very good college. There's some really outstanding departments and I think we can work to make it an even stronger college. It's diverse: we have 21 departments with differing missions, differing priorities in terms of some of their goals.

We've got some good students here. I think one of the things that happens here is that students have to work more, so I see students not taking as many credits.

I would advise the students not to be in too big a hurry to make up their minds of what direction they want to go. I think students in the first year or so ought to be taking several courses from different departments, getting a feel of the kinds of material, the content of them. My advise is for a student to be as broadly educated as possible.

The one problem that concerns us all the most is budget considerations. We lost five faculty positions and that's in a time when we're getting more students in the college. That's a concern: we want to get some positions restored. We ought to have some more positions rather than fewer. We had to turn away between 100 and 150 students out of English.

Education is important. I think all we have to do is look and see the changes and how fast they're being made in our society and with that happening, I think it's even more important that we have education be involved in those changes. ’ ’

Richard Hughes Business Administration

‘ ‘ Immense growth of students has been substantial — we can’t really even keep up with it. We don’t feel we are really doing as well as we should because the number of students outstrips the number of faculty.

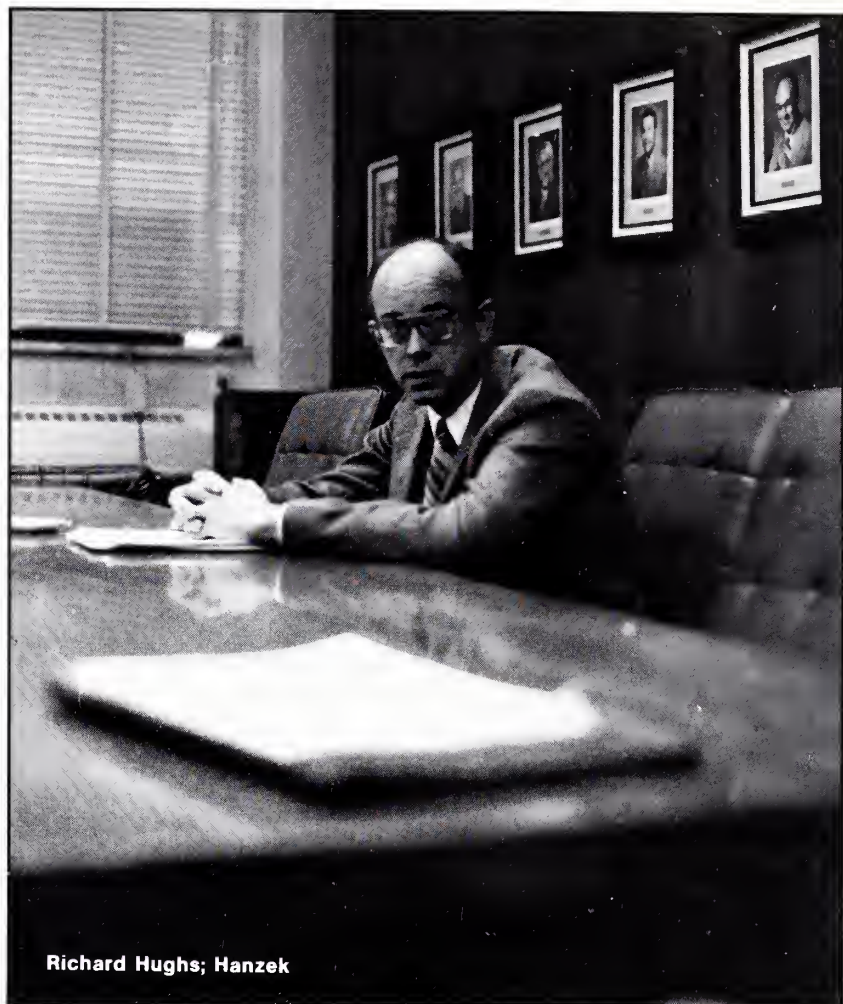

Through the Bureau of Economic Research, we’re probably providing the largest amount of local and statewide business issues in Nevada.

As for the future of the college, I hope it will improve. I expect growth will continue for quite a number of years. We’re certainly getting better students.

I’m pleased with the amount of interest in freshman and sophomore classes.

Any advice I would give to students would be to ensure that early in their career, take seriously the need to develop skills in mathematical and quantitative areas and behavioral areas. Managing business enterprises is more complicated. You need a stronger set of tools to work with.

In the business area, business education is much more important today than 10 years ago. We need better individuals for management training. Experience on the job is diminishing because of special skills needed. ’ ’

Richard Hughes; Hanzek

Edmund J. Cain; Hanzek

Edmund J. Cain Education

“ One thing I would advise students coming into education on is to be prepared. A teacher has all sorts of possibilities for future careers.

I think the job of a teacher and preparing teachers has become increasingly difficult because our whole society has gone through some tremendous changes. It's always a matter of attempting to keep up with maintaining a quality education in the public schools through teachers that help place there. The new demands that are placed on the schools are what society decides they should have.

I think we have some very good students. One of our jobs is to help young people who want to teach and are getting into teaching be able to work effectively in helping a school become a real part of the community.

We are somewhat short-staffed, particularly in the graduate levels. That's one of the reasons we've had to cap some of the programs. We need an expanded budget; we need more faculty where the students are.

We have developed some new programs. In the past five years that related particularly to specializations in special education.

We're a nationally accredited school and we're accredited by the National Council on Accreditation for Teacher Education. That puts some restraints on what we can do and what we cannot do to maintain our quality programs. ”

Charles Breese; Hanzek

Charles Breese

Engineering

‘ ‘ If I were to offer any advice to a university student in the College of Engineering, it would be to study hard while you’re in school and take advantage of the opportunities offered.

When you’re through school, you’re not through learning. Being an engineer is a lifelong learning process.

In seven years, the number of students in the college has more than doubled. For example, in the fall of 1974, the student count was 421. This fall, it has jumped to 909 students.

One problem with this tremendous growth is that there are no corresponding increases in resources, and therefore, enrollment was limited this year.

Classes are overcrowded. This is critical in upper-division courses.

Under the circumstances, we’re doing a pretty good job. We lack resources to do an adequate job, meaning money is needed for people, equipment and space. Inflation continues to be erosive.

I think the college is good. The graduate students who have done uniformly very well. They tell me they feel very satisfied with their education; I think they’re good students.

The world’s becoming more technically oriented. I think education is important and is going to continue to be important. ’ ’

Because only the First Interstate Bank system has offices in 450 communities all over the West.

So now, when you travel in the West, you can always find a bank where you're never a stranger.

And when you move in the West and want to move the money, respect, and good will you've built up over the years from one First Interstate Bank to another, you've got the right.

It comes with the territory.

Donna Beth Downer

Home Economics

“ I think the School of Home Economics has to be a dynamic, changing unit, simply because we’re training professionals who will be addressing family problems, problems that families will have in the years ahead.

We’re in the process of looking at our curriculum right now and re-addressing what we have been requiring in the way of home economics core credits in order to better prepare our graduates for their professional roles. I envision some change in content of courses.

We’ve all kind of gotten away from preserving food in the home, but with inflation, with energy, with what we see as the limitations on our natural resources, with interests in better nutrition, people are all of a sudden saying, “I can do this better, and I can do it cheaper in my own home.”

Money is always a problem. It’s simply a shift in what you incorporate into course content. We have looked more toward preparing our professionals to be dietitians, to be knowledgeable about nutrition, to encourage people to utilize preparation methods that give them the most value.

I think our greatest problem is two-fold. One is physical facilities. Our building is 24-years-old, and in our labs, particularly, we are seeing outdated equipment and arrangements. We need money in order to rennovate those facilities.

Secondly, home economics encompasses about five subject matter areas. These areas have grown almost exponentially in terms of the body of knowledge, the accumulation of literary research in those areas. For a student to be exposed to the knowledge and ideas, we need faculty who are current.

I see our students hampered somewhat by their lack of self-confidence, their lack of feeling that they can do the job, and they CAN. They recognize the constraints of the job market, and they want to go out of here able to function in a professional role and do it well.

I think the future is ours. When we look at the social forces, the economics forces, etc., the opportunities to help families cope with those changes are tremendous.

Home economics is going to be a very vital field. I think we have much to contribute to all people who may be seeking independent living skills, who may be seeking the answers to problems individually or within their own families. We have the expertise and the knowledge to help them. ”

Medicine

“ This is a good medical school. I’m very impressed with it. The major reason for that is that the students are superb, some of the finest I’ve seen in medical schools. It’s the students that make the school good or bad, more than the faculty. The students that come here are highly motivated, very mature people.

The goal of the medical school is to train physicians who have a good background in what we call primary care. Primary care is the kind of doctoring that a person goes to first, that’s a pediatrician, family physician or general interest. Our purpose is to train people in the three specialities called primary care, and that makes us rather unique in that most medical schools train people in everything from heart surgery to family practice.

I think I would ask the student to consider a couple of things. I would ask the student to consider what his responsibilities to society are, and ask himself whether or not he doesn’t have some sort of responsibility to go into careers that will fulfill and meet some of society’s needs.

I think the medical school had a time of about two years before I came here, without a permanent acting dean. I think that when that happens, there’s sort of a feeling of unrest. The major thing, it seems to me, that has occurred is that somebody sits in his office on a permanent basis and gives the feeling of stability.

The other thing is that relationships between the school and the university have improved considerably in the past.

There are people in the university who, because the medical school is expensive, feel that maybe the medical school is taking money that would go other places if we weren’t here.

We have some money problems. We don’t have serious money problems. In talking to most all of the legislators, there was a strong commitment that they have toward the medical school. They’re proud of it. We don’t deserve proportionally any more money than anybody else. I think the state been generous to us.

Our enrollment is set. It can’t increase. These 48 students take all their classes together. We have less than one percent who don’t graduate, so very few drop out or are flunked out. ”

Robert Daugherty, Keweenaw

Joseph Lintz

Mining

‘ ‘ The college is poised on the threshold of greatness. It's about to enter its finest hour. With the completion of the new building, future accreditation of our one unaccredited chemical engineering program, we are no longer recruiting numbers of students, we are recruiting quality.

If you look at our ACT scores, the average is about 24, which is quite high. It's one of the highest averages on the campus. We have good students and we intend to get even better students in the future.

I would advise students to be true to themselves, and not to be satisfied with less than the best that they are capable of performing. Never by statisfied with second rate performance.

When I came here, the student population was 75. Now it's 430 students. We've added curricula; we've had considerable steady growth.

We cannot education our students in four walls. We have rather expensive and extensive field trips. We spend literally $7,000 a semester on field trips.

The United States is in a confrontation with those governments whose philosophy is at wide variance with ours.

Much of this confrontation is going to be decided on the basis of the mineral base: What are the resources? So, our graduates are the front-line troops in the resources war. ’ ’

Joseph Lintz

Marion Schrum Nursing

“ I see the future of the college as continuing the current quality of the baccalaureate program and to extend the program to registered nurses who do not now have their degree and who will seek their degree in the future. I think that’s an important mission of the School of Nursing which we have not yet fully developed. The other plan is to, perhaps, broaden the scope within the limits of the graduate program and also to do more than we’re doing in continuing education out in the state. That is somewhat the five-year goal as we now see it.

I think we have practically no breathing room financially. Classes are limited because of the number of faculty. We try to keep our student-faculty ratio, which is very rich when you compare it to other schools in the university, to about one faculty for every eight students.

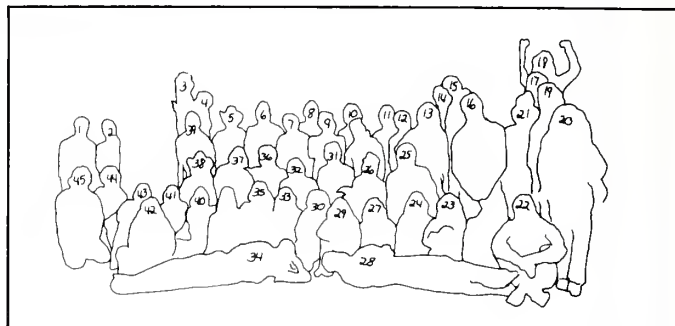

In our graduate program, almost all the students but, perhaps, three or four are part-time because we haven’t the faculty resources to take on more students full time.

During the students’ experience in college, I would advise them to keep a healthy balance between their academic and social life. I think every student ought to take advantage of social opportunities that are available in the university because those are precious years that you can’t duplicate any place.”

It has been hard, it has been long.
 Some question why? I can not answer.
 I have tried, sometimes not my best, though I have tried.
 You provided the opportunity. The opportunity for me to be with you in your homes, your fun, your friends, your activities, and above all your lives. You have given me everything. Now this I give to you.
 My fourth and final book, five years to make, now is over.
 I am tired, so very tired. Now I can go. I can finally go Home.

John Moseley Newman

The Artemisia appreciates the support given throughout the year. Special thanks are extended to: Marilyn Courson, Pete Perriera, Sally Carothers, Dean Roberta Barnes, the Rally Squad, the ASUN office staff, the Admissions and Records Office, the Controller's Office, John Gonzales, the Purchasing Office, the Office of Communications and Broadcasting, and the Publications Board

Personal thanks to Mike Bryant for the generous use of his airplane and camera equipment.-S.A.
